Two Columns of Weather

Column one begins with the morning report. Fog lay over the harbour until nine, and the ferry waited at the pier with its engines idling while the pilots argued about the channel.

By noon the wind had turned to the west and the fog lifted in long grey ribbons that drifted over the hills behind the town.

Fishermen who had stayed ashore mended their nets on the quay and watched the sky for any sign of the storm the radio had promised.

Column two carries the evening forecast. Rain is expected after midnight, heavy at times along the coast, with gusts strong enough to rattle the shutters of the old customs house.

Tomorrow should clear by mid-morning, leaving a cold bright afternoon that is ideal for walking the cliff path to the lighthouse.

Readers planning a crossing are advised to check the ferry timetable before leaving home.

This closing note spans both columns and should come after both of them.
